Embracing Moral Truth: Why Bible Believing Christians Will Soon be in the Crossfire

Acceptance and diversity quickly supplanting the biblical values of our forefathers

Yorba Linda, California – The religious beliefs and behavior of Americans have changed dramatically in the last decade. These changes are responsible for policy changes in everything from gay marriage, educational reform, and recent Supreme Court rulings. “Faith in America is definitely in a crisis” observes Pamela Christian, who studied apologetics at Biola University.

The key changes began as religious diversity and tolerance replaced beliefs in absolute moral truth which largely sustained American values since its founding. These changes translated into redefining sexual behavior, marriage and personal responsibility but spilled over into churches as well. According to Christian, “Subjective truth is not only irrational, it’s also exceedingly dangerous.” What makes it dangerous is that all ideas are seen as having equal value regardless of logic or facts.

Christian, the author of Examine Your Faith: Finding Truth in a World of Lies, explains how we are trying to take religion out of the realm of rational discourse and relegate it to the area of personal preferences and opinions. “A person’s feelings are highly respected in a culture that promotes tolerance,” she says, and this leads to misguided assumptions, policies, and educating people away from truth. Today, she explains, “Public school systems teach kids what to think rather than how to think.”

While Christians are taught to love people regardless of their beliefs they are not taught to accept these beliefs as equally valid. In Examine Your Faith, Christian carefully describes what it means to defend the truth, offers an overview of major belief systems, and helps readers examine the claims of Christianity on their own while offering evidence for the uniqueness of Christ’s claims through both prophecy and literature. She says that human beings intrinsically desire truth but find it increasingly difficult to proclaim truth in unequivocal terms.

As Christian reminds us, merely believing is not faith. In fact, a growing number of people now embrace no religion at all or claim to be secular humanists. But for those who do claim to believe, Christian says they must develop a better understanding as to why Christ’s claims trump all other belief systems.
